HOT-WEATHER DEMANDS.
Restaurant Men Tell of the Troubles with Customers in the Heated Season. dtd

"We have far more trouble in satisfying our customers in the hot weather than we do in winter," said the proprietor of a downtown quick-luncheon resort, where 2,000 persons are fed every working day, according to the New York Times. "Our profits are relatively smaller. It is far less trouble to keep things hot than it is to keep them cold. In winter a customer is hungry, and soon makes up his mind about a bowl of soup, a hot roast beef sandwich, or a plate of beef and beans. dtd

"But in hot weather the man who has to hurry more or less over his luncheon is cross. He won't crowd in anywhere, as he will in winter. He wants plenty of room—a whole table to himself, if he can get it. If he cannot get right underneath an electric fan he loses his temper. Ask the waiters. They will tell you that a customer who is an angel of goodness in comfortable weather becomes a fault-finding old woman when it gets hot and his collar is wilted. dtd

"Men don't come to luncheon in summer because they are hungry, but because they are faint and must eat something. In the winter there is more in the market that we can sell at cheap prices than there is in summer. Of course, in the high-priced places, and at the fashionable up-town cafes, very tempting hot-weather dishes are served. But they are not for the quick luncheon of the masses, or the man who has to consider his purse. dtd

"Although this is the right time of year for fresh vegetables, they are almost as dear as meat. In winter customers do not grumble if we serve canned asparagus, peas and beans with a portion of meat, but in summer they call the manager and want to know what is the matter with fresh vegetables. In the first place, canned vegetables are only half the price in July that they are in January. Wholesalers will not carry their stock over. Retailers and restaurant men get the benefit of cut prices just when fresh vegetables are at the flood. But these, in turn, are bought up by the canners. If a farmer in New Jersey raises an immense crop of tomatoes, for instance, he sells the entire crop to a cannery agent and does not bother about sending them to market. All this has its effect on the restaurant and hotel trade. dtd

"Sandwiches soon dry up in summer, and we are compelled to make them in smaller quantities and to replenish the counters oftener. A great many customers won't have a lump of ice put in a glass of hot tea and wait for it to cool. They want tea already iced. Our stock of this is soon disposed of by early comers in the luncheon rush. It takes some time to cool more tea, and customers who come in the interval grumble and say our place is no good. dtd

"Puddings and pastry that look very appetizing in cold weather have a very defective appearance when you trot them out on a hot July day. About the only thing we can satisfy all hands on is ice cream. We seldom go wrong on that. Many a customer who looks grumpy over a luncheon that disappoints him goes away smiling if he tops it off with a plate of good ice cream." dtd

They look so "dressy" that they almost take the place of a dress hat. The shapes are so becoming, too. Our hats have an air of exclusiveness about them that other hats don't have. The prices are very reasonable.
